What's New in the?

SearchBasic is a search tool aimed at helping users identify which files and folders have words or phrases in them. For example, you can use this application to find text inside RTF or TXT documents, as well as to locate files containing certain addresses. This simple-to-use, but powerful text search tool has the ability to open the files and folders you specify as search targets. Once you've configured it, the program will open at once the text of the documents you provide, and will list all of them that have the term that you're looking for. You can then open the respective file or folder or copy the displayed results to the clipboard. What you can do with this program: SearchBasic's main feature is its ability to quickly and efficiently locate text in files. For example, it can help you find addresses or emails inside RTF or TXT documents, or identify information such as names or email addresses in document files. You can do all this using just a few clicks and a few mouse moves. Specifically, you can specify the files and directories containing the text you want to find; enter a search term in the 'Text To Find' field; specify whether to search case-sensitively or not; configure the size of the found elements; limit the number of search results; or choose to display only the text you're interested in. You can easily find the files and folders containing search results using the tree menu or simply press the 'Find' button. If you do so, the program will open the file and you can view more information or open it. You can also just copy the contents of the search results to the clipboard. Additional features: The option to exclude subfolders from the search does not require you to manually add all of them in the 'Text To Find' field. You can exclude more than one subfolder or select a folder as a starting point. The program does not count the number of words or files in the search results, and it is not necessary to establish a minimum or maximum number of elements. A reminder option lets you quickly view the search results at any time. SearchBasic runs without external programs. This program does not only enable you to find text inside text documents, but it can be used to quickly identify names, emails or other such information in files. However, its popularity can be attributed to its ability to find specific words inside text files and folders
